

Argentina – Strategy

February 15, 2023

Argentina Morning View

- IN A NUTSHELL: January's CPI printed 6%mom, signaling a generalized re-acceleration of core and seasonal prices. The government blames volatile prices affected by the drought, regulated prices, and indexation for the acceleration. Our BVAR model suggests that the government is underestimating macro drivers.
- RATIONALE: The January CPI print came at 6%mom, slightly higher than our baseline view and in line with the market consensus' upper range. It's the hottest January since 1991, printing almost 210bp higher than January 2022. In this context, the yearly gauge accelerated to 98.8%oy, with our base scenario expecting it to breach the 100%oy mark in February.

The inflationary acceleration was generalized, with core, seasonal, and regulated prices picking up the pace. Core prices printed 5.4%mom, up 10bp from December. Seasonal prices accelerated from 4.6%mom in December to 7.9%mom in January, on the back of a 6.8%mom increase in foods and beverages driven by beef, fruits, and vegetable prices and the usual summer seasonality on recreation and hospitality. Regulated prices picked up to 7.1% in January, up from 5.1%mom, driven by housing (+8%mom) and telcos (+8%mom).

The print is uncomfortable for the government because it puts into question (i) the benign inflationary scenario to which Mr. Massa conditioned his candidacy and (ii) the inflationary strategy. Mr. Rubinstein went on the record arguing that the negative inflationary surprise was driven by a series of one-offs (beef, fruits, and vegetables spiking because of the drought) and the cadence of private sector regulated prices. He stressed that macro policy remains consistent with inflation below 4%mom but conceded that the timeline to reach a print with a 3-handle could come much later in the year than the government's April target.

At first sight, Mr. Rubinstein's comments seem reasonable. Core prices have been roughly stable since November, contributing about 3.8pp to the monthly CPI. In this context, a higher contribution from seasonal (+10bp) and regulated (+0.6pp) explain the re-acceleration of the monthly CPI. Still, a more thorough analysis of the inflationary process reveals the cracks in the government's diagnostic. Suppose for a second that inflation was converging, as the government expects, to a 3.99%mom baseline. We model this scenario into our BVAR model, taking as an input the BCRA's FX slide and the tariff hikes that the government has committed. We find that seasonal prices should contribute 0.7pp to monthly inflation and regulated prices about 0.4pp. That means that, for inflation to print 3.99%mom, core prices cannot contribute more than 2.9pp. Over the past quarter, the fiscal-monetary policy mix seems to have stabilized the core inflation contribution at 3.8pp per month, suggesting that, contrary to Mr. Rubinstein's remarks, the macro policy is not yet consistent with sub-4%mom inflation. As we argued yesterday (please see here), monetary policy remains accommodative, subject to fiscal dominance (to support the ARS curve), and financial dominance (to cover the quasi-fiscal deficit), failing to curb core prices despite the phasing out of direct money printing to cover the primary deficit. Likewise, the FX market remains a critical driver of inflation, both resulting from the pass-through of the official fixing's crawling peg and the import restrictions. Finally, while the government has tried to toughen the bias of fiscal and monetary policies, income policy became extraordinarily supportive in 4Q, becoming a key driver for prices.

In this context, we're revising our February base view to 5.7%mom, up from 5.2%mom, consistent with high-freq prints, and our March view to 6.5%mom, up from 6.3%mom.
