Argentina Morning View

- IN A NUTSHELL: Mr. Massa told the press that the Government plans to announce on Monday a rationalization of the myriad of FXs created over the past couple of years. The new framework would involve a preferential FX for exports of certain goods, a punishing FX for goods and services that the Government wants to discourage, and the official fixing for everything else. The local media reports Alberto Fernandez asked President Biden for USD10bn in new financing.
- RATIONALE: They say the human being is the only animal that repeatedly trips on the same stone. And Peronism is as human as it comes. Retreading past mistakes, Mr. Massa announced yesterday that he plans to unveil a new FX framework on Monday. The announcement of the announcement. Seems like we've been here before. Still, with the BCS weakening past the USDARS400 mark, the BCRA continuing to sell reserves in the FX market, and the retail banks extending the drainage of hard currency deposits, the Government needed to do something. What it could do was unclear, so the Administration relied on one of its greatest hits: differential FXs.

According to the media, the Government plans to reorganize the existing multiple FX framework starting Monday into three FXs. The first is a preferential FX for exporters, initially available for grain exporters during a 30-day window and later expanded for an additional 90 days to regional products and other exports with limited impact on the CPI. The new preferential FX for exporters is designed to front-load dollar flows and plug the 2Q gap, preventing the FX market from seizing before the Primaries. Still, the devil is in the details. A transitory differential FX worked last year because the problem that the Government needed to crack was farmers stocking grain and not selling it. This year, the problem is different. There's very little grain to sell in 2023, regardless of the price. Even then, most farmers expect a repeat of 2015, when the Macri administration lifted capital controls almost from day one, with the subsequent REER correction. In this context, the price incentive competes with the expectation of the "brecha" closing in a few months. Would a USDARS265/270 FX (December's USDARS230, inflation-adjusted) be enough to sway farmers? Or would something higher than USDARS300 be required? Also, if the new differentiated FX introduction is staggered, going initially to grain exporters and then to the rest of the eligible exporters, the Government could end Osborning non-grain exports until the start of the differentiated FX and non-eligible exports with players expecting to sell benefitting from a similar carrot.

The second FX would involve unifying the different surcharges that the Government created to dissuade agents from draining reserves for buying goods and services that the Administration deems irrelevant. Right now, there's an FX for tourism, an FX for remunerating international artists performing in Argentina, an FX for jewelry and fine timepieces, and an FX for cars, all created by adding levies over the official fixing. We expect these to be folded into a single FX, potentially weaker than the BCS, to discourage agents from using it and draining reserves.

The third FX would be the official fixing, which would continue to support all other transactions. Interestingly, this framework would only seem to address the merchandise and the services' accounts, leaving the financial account unattended (maybe the AL selling is the final piece in the puzzle). As we argued a few days ago, for the Government to have a chance of making it until the Primaries in a competitive shape, the FX framework needs to (i) increase USD inflows from exports, (ii) obturate outflows from non-essential transactions, and (iii) allow the Government to flatten the crawling peg of the official fixing. As it stands, we're skeptical that what's currently in the press would be enough to satisfy all three conditions. For starters, it is unclear whether the differentiated FX can make a substantial difference in USD inflows without the implementation details. That's probably why the media reports today that Mr. Fernandez asked President Biden for USD10bn in fresh financing to build a bridge until the primaries. Second, the outflow problem will not be solved simply by "rationalizing" the surcharges. Ultimately, as long as the penalty FX is constructed as the official fixing plus a levy, it will require maintaining the crawling peg of the official fixing at a pace similar to inflation, which prevents core prices from decelerating. Finally, because as reported, the framework leaves too many transactions still governed by the official fixing, which is a disincentive for exports and a boon for imports.

All in all, the Government is trying to grapple with the problem, but Mr. Massa is bringing a smile into a gunfight (yeah, not even a knife). The framework to be announced on Monday will depend critically on the Government securing additional financing from IFIs and bilateral lenders. The IMF will now unlock the March tranche of the EFF program, but those monies will evaporate in the next three weeks, used to repay maturities with the Fund. As we argued yesterday, the Government's success depends on securing at least USD5bn in new financing, USD3bn in cash from IFIs, and USD2bn from the IMF over the scheduled disbursements to make Fund payments net zero in 2023. More importantly, it needs financing over the next three months to prevent FX market dynamics from becoming untenable in late 2Q or early 3Q. We'll stay tuned to what the Government announces on Monday. Without the announcement of fresh financing, no amount of tweaking the FX framework will make the BoP math check out.
